NALEO Educational Fund Comments on Election 2022

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO) Educational Fund released the following statement from CEO Arturo Vargas on Latino voters and the results so far for the 2022 Midterm Elections:

“While votes are still being tallied and many races are too close to call, this election has once again showcased the diversity and impact of the nation’s Latino electorate. In the coming days, we will examine the results and data before drawing broad or overly simplistic conclusions about the Latino electorate.

“Sweeping assumptions about Latino voters based on the outcome in a state or single contest would be premature and shortsighted. NALEO Educational Fund continues to affirm that Latinos cannot be confined to a single voting bloc.

“The final results of Election 2022 will not be the last word on the vast array of Latino political perspectives. From local races to U.S. Senate seats and governorships — Election 2022 — just as in previous election years, has captured a single moment in time for our communities and democracy. Latinos will continue to look closely at candidates from across the political spectrum and make their choices based on those who best address the issues they care about.

“Looking ahead, sustained engagement and outreach with Latino voters, especially those in non-battleground states like California and Texas, will continue to be paramount. The parties, campaigns, and candidates who realize this will have the best chance at winning in 2024 and beyond.”
